Organisations advocating for the rights and interests of employees, children, old people, people with a disability, gender minorities, and many more, are important players in democratic societies. They make sure that specific interests and minority demands are discussed in the public and possibly heard in parliament. But to what extent do such organisations reflect the diversity of German society? Are immigrant interests well represented by such mainstream organisations? What determines whether and how migration-related social change reaches civil society organisations? The panel will discuss results of a new book that presents results of the research project ZOMiDi with some of its authors.
